A bit dated now in 2014 -- no one needs a DAT button anymore and the unit has no HDMI capability, so it's not the focal point of a home-AV set-up like it used to be. But build solid with wonderful sound, low THD and quiet Phono section. Ergonomics aren't great as it's hard to read the legends on the ...

Sony STR-GX909ES A/V Receivers - AudioReview

Sony's words to describe it are: A proprietary Sony amplifier power supply technology which employs separate voltage rails for different amplifier stages. This methods provides greater headroom and helps prevent clipping. If you're more technically inclined, I also believe the following is from Sony's manual:

Sony STR-GX9ES | Classic Receivers

(In general, SONY does not have a clue when it come to remotes....a billion buttons does not make for a good remote) The manual spent more time explaining why you should not submerge the unit in water than it did on how to configure the receiver for home theater listening. The documentation is shameful and Sony's factory service is worse.
